TRADE AND ENVIRONMENT : POLICY AND PRACTICE

Expansion of international trade has raised the issue of the relationship between trade and the environment. Is trade good or bad for the environment? The answer is not easy to give; it depends on the value that we attach to the environment vis-à-vis the economic and social benefits received from such trade. Trade is bound to exist till we continue to pay attention to the Territorial Production Advantages; in fact, it will expand with greater and greater specialisation. It will definitely have environmental effects on both, the countries of origin and destination, as also on the zone used as a passage.

The impact of trade on environment was recognised as early as 1970s (Meadows et al. 1972); but the focus was more on resource exploitation. The growing concern about the impact of economic growth on human development and environment was, for the first time, addressed at the Conference on the Human Environment at Stockholm held in 1972. During the Uruguay Round (1986 – 1994), trade related environmental issues were once again taken up. Trade has also impacted the global climate significantly. According to the Preamble to the Marrakech Agreement fundamental goals of the WTO are sustainable development, and, the protection and preservation of the Environment. The emerging twenty-first century global economy will be characterized both by resource and environmental limits and by a conflict of interests between the presently developed and developing nations.

In the light of the same, it is proposed to review the current status of trade practices and its impact on the environment in the context of international trade at an Interdisciplinary by seeking the views of the experts from different fields. Such a seminar is likely to evolve a consensus on the conflicting interests to help emerge with some valuable cogent suggestions to guide policy formulation in future.

The seminar will also make an attempt to sensitize teachers on various contentious issues related to trade and its impact on environment as also the various trade treaties thereon.
